Katrina's Outrage
by Kimberly Satterfield

1.
Katrina wrestled the with the wind,
her boy child,
wild from the unbearable heat burning the heavens.
He escaped from her grasp, crashing
like a slap across the city of New Orleans.

2.
After Katrina tamed her boy her eyes screamed.
She wailed the sea from her mouth when she saw that her girl child, the earth was dying,
New Orleans drowned in the storm of her tears.
3.

For greed and foolishness the pale men stood silent, hung their fear like a noose around the necks
of the not-yet-dead, deaf to the hundreds -
the thousands of voices crying out in the night for help.

The elders,
the mothers with babies waited for the boats as the water rose from their ankles to their necks - the boats never came.

5.

After Katrina, surprised a nation that has lost its breath she plunged her raw, uncompromising power into the hearts of the women while they wept into to the breasts of men who understood that they must offer as oblations to the sacrifice; the hundreds and thousands of bodies that cover the floor of New Orleans with bony blankets and to the survivors waiting for Katrina to come again with a different name to avenge them.
