The academic-practice gap has been well documented for over four decades in the literature, and current literature suggests the viewpoints of academic and practice leaders remain divergent. Closing this gap will require a dedicated and coordinated response from both academia and the clinical practice institutions. Additionally, diversity in the Nursing field is essential because it provides opportunities to administer quality care to patients. Goals: The panelists will share their unique perspectives and offer Strategies for Bridging Gaps between Diversity, Academics, and Community/Clinical Partnerships.
