THE BELLY
Aijuana Bifri

The Star-Spangled Banner plays and I don’t have my hands on my heart next thing I know, I hear,

“You anti-American immigrant leech if you don’t like America, why don’t you leave?

if you don’t like America, why don’t you go home?

you’ve talked shit about this country expressing your pain in this country aren’t you thankful we serve you in this country?

all you do is take money from this country you ungrateful…”

Wait, wait, hold on. Ungrateful?
I wasn’t here by choice

America looked at me in the eye and told me it was time diagram there was barely anything else to consume in my country so America consumed me when I packed my bags a road a plane to LA now this beast got me trapped in his belly and every day I struggle for a peace of mind

In the Philippines…

the aftermath of colonial war got our parents slain that’s why children find a livin lookin up to white names our rich culture and identity is left in hieroglyphics now we live this sad reality today to be specific Imagine houses made of cardboard and kids fifty pounds kill each other for a bowl of soup, aint scared of the sound of police, because it’s fight and die or don’t fight and die this is Filipino reality when they look up to the sky and see a billboard of the bully saying McDonald’s and Coke reminding you that he can feed you and bring you some hope that’s why we stab each other fearlessly, looking for change but our hustle and our kill aint enough, it stays the same each and every one of us tried to plant a seed to grow crops but the bully buys it off so he could use it for stocks he took our fruits with his Dole, took our milk with his Nestle took our beach with his resort, took our shoes with his Nike’s tells us we can’t progress, he’s convinced us we’re lazy tells us we are less, while we watch his Hollywood babies make us envy them and wish we were his little children we look up to this cannibal who comes to us and we give him what we have, but if we’re broke he comes to swallow us whole am I supposed to feel good when he’s digesting what he stole?

digesting me, using me so he could grow, this tyrant leviathan of the sea, ogre of a giant

We gave him all his nutrients, paying these taxes working for less, build his success while he advances he’s been to different lands, swallowed other brothers and sisters now he says he will deport us as his belly gets stricter as if we’re leaving his belly with more than we had before his exploits, cost of living has made us remain poor legal or illegal, immigrants boost the economy washed white to bend in fields and prepared for sodomy

But maybe you’re right, maybe I should be grateful in his belly with my mom’s paycheck-to-paycheck life maybe I’d rather be here than my desolate land devoured where billions of hungry mouths live each day with a dollar

Wherever I’m taken, without equity I’m restless you see I’m not anti-American; I’m pro-justice.
